The Lancet Haematology

Overview

The global community of researchers and clinicians working in the research and treatment of haematological disease needs a source of information that is authoritative, evidence-based, and clinically relevant. The Lancet Haematology will become that source, with practice-changing research articles, expert commentary, and provocative opinion in an online-only format. The topics in this journal will be broad, reflecting the breadth of the subject matter, focusing on research that advocates change in, or illuminates, haematological clinical practice. This will include haematology-oncology, red and white blood cell disorders, platelet disorders, stem cell transplantation and induced pluripotent stem cells, transfusion medicine, and related conditions and diseases. Although there have been great leaps towards in haematological research and patient care, there is still much work to be done, and we hope you will join us in delivering better health.
